I've downloaded a draft of a document describing the current state of HTML and CSS to help our international team of web designers, and I've come across the following definition of what makes something a "high contrast document": A high contrast document is one that has an adequate contrast for all users, but whose content is legible even to the elderly and people with poor eyesight. What does "adequate contrast" mean? A: The document you have linked says, in a different way: A high contrast document is one that has an adequate contrast for all users, but whose content is legible even to the elderly and people with poor eyesight. The document you have linked states that a high contrast document has adequate contrast for all users. High contrast means that there is a high contrast between white and black areas of a document. There is less contrast between white and black areas of a document for a high contrast user. Adequate contrast means that the white pixels in
